

GAS-LIQUID STRATIFIED FLOW

When gas and liquid flow in a pipe, there exist some particular conditions for which the two phases are separated from each other by a continuous interface. Such a flow is dominated by the gravity force that causes the liquid to stratifies at the bottom of the pipe (figure 1). This flow pattern can be observed in horizontal or slightly inclined pipelines. It is characterised by the structure of the interface which may be smooth or wavy according to the gas flow rate. At low gas velocity, the interface is smooth or may be rippled by small capillary waves of a few millimetres long. With increasing gas velocity, small amplitude regular waves appear. At high enough velocity of gas, droplets can be entrained from the large amplitude irregular waves and deposited at the wall or at the interface; however this atomisation phenomenon is out of the scope of this chapter.
