

Health literacy in four decades: from clinical challenge to a global social movement

Posted on October 31, 2018 by BMJ GH Blogs

The health literacy field is developing exponentially. Four decades ago it was alluded in an educational policy statement and later considered a challenge for filling in medical forms and a barrier for communication and clinical practice. It was an issue discussed by few. Today, the collective health literacy actions characterise a global social movement on the rise[1].

Health literacy is closely linked to literacy and entails the knowledge, motivation and competencies to access, understand, appraise and apply information for making decisions concerning healthcare, disease prevention and health promotion to improve and maintain the quality of life during the life course with support from relevant professional stakeholders. The social and political developments have occurred because the case of health literacy has turned out to be evident, measurable, feasible and for the public good.

Research has shown health literacy to be a significant public health challenge which needs attention. According to international studies 30-65% face problems with limited health literacy which can cause inequalities for patients and economic drains of healthcare budgets due to the lack of targeted treatments and timely and appropriate care and communication.

In response to the challenge, interest groups and networks have formed across the world working for the common goal of creating health literate societies. Together they form a rising social movement building on purposeful, organised efforts which drive social change towards better health for all. The collective and persistent actions forming the movement happens
