General Accounting Office,1999      Electronic Banking United States. General Accounting Office,1999 Internet banking heightens traditional banking risks GAO s review of 81 examinations found that 44 percent of the depository institutions examined had not completely implemented risk management steps that regulators said are needed to limit on line banking risks Shortcomings included some institutions lack of approval of strategic plans by their board of directors and a lack of policies and procedures at some institutions for Internet banking operations However too few examinations had been done at the time of GAO s review to identify the extent of any industrywide Internet banking related problems Regulators attributed the limited number of examinations to a diversion of examiners to deal with the Year 2000 computer problems and to the limited number of examiners with expertise in information systems GAO found that some regulators could use more systematic methods for identifying institutions plans for new Internet banking systems and maintaining this information centrally GAO also found variations in the supervisory approaches the regulators followed to help ensure that institutions mitigate the risks posed by Internet banking Finally GAO found that the five regulators are beginning to work together to study third party firms providing Internet banking support services GAO summarized this report in testimony before Congress see Electronic Banking Enhancing Federal Oversight of Internet Banking Activities by Richard J Hillman Associate Director for Financial Institutions and Markets Issues before the Subcommittee on Domestic and International Monetary Policy House Committee on Banking and Financial Services GAO T GGD 99 152 Aug 3 25 pages      S. 803, E-government Act of 2001 United States.
