

Magnificent movers

All cats are extremely agile and can leap with great power, although, apart from the cheetah, they can run fast over only short distances (pp. 42-43). Unlike many other carnivores, the cat has collar bones, which prevent it from jarring its shoulders when it leaps from a height. The shoulder blades are placed well at the sides of the cat's chest, which helps it to climb. Cats that spend a lot of time in trees, such as the leopard (pp. 32-33), have long tails for balance. All cats walk on their toes and their feet have thick, soft pads so they can move quietly.

Wild cat strikes
A big cat is so powerful that it can kill with one lunge of a paw. This cat shows the strength and speed most feline predators have.

Cat pads are the same shape as human pads, but they are much softer.

Cat leapers can have long, thin tails to help them balance.

Nine lives

Cats can fall from great heights and almost never to land on their feet. Many of the small cats, as well as the leopard, spread much of their body in flares. Their highly developed sense of balance helps them feel how moving animals the air currents, while clinging along a thin branch. The various species have evolved so that the cat can right itself and right to land on its feet.

When leaping, cats spread their paws together to catch the air and act as a parachute.

One giant leap...

Cats jump by flexing and releasing the muscles of the torso and legs, while balancing with the tail. Unlike many other jumping animals, a cat can judge its landing position with great accuracy. This is essential for a hunter of fast-moving, small prey.

Female cat

Practice

All cats and kittens have to exercise their bodies and muscles before they can be as flexible as their parents. This young cat is practising how to leap to its body, but with practice it will learn to be as agile as its mother.

Running wild

When a cat runs it pushes off with both back legs at the same time, but places the front paws down separately. Examine the pictures to see the sequence of 100% to show how a cat moves when running.

Cool cat

Most cats seem to enjoy swimming, apart from tigers, who spend a lot of time in the water. Tigers living in the tropical rain forests of Asia use the water to keep cool.

Front paws push and rear legs to bring back paws forward.

All four paws touch ground.

Tail is extended the distance the cat is jumping.

Up a gum tree

All felines have to learn to climb. At first, they often use their front paws to grip the bark of a tree and use their hind legs to push up or down. After a few days, however, all the felines learn to climb and leap on their feet.

Balancing act

This cat shows how it can walk along the top of a very high, very narrow fence. It places its paws exactly one in front of the other and is never in danger of falling.
