complex standards formal trainings and inspections are always capable of providing much safer food items and beverages to consumers as opposed to the lesser developed countries and regions of the world Clearly the available data regarding the morbidity and the mortality in different areas of the world confirms that in developing countries the prevalence and the incidence of presumptive foodborne illness is much greater However other factors need to be taken into consideration in this overall picture First of all one of the key issues in developing countries appears to be the availability of safe drinking water a key element in any food safety strategy Second the availability of healthcare facilities care providers and medicines in different parts of the world makes the consequences of foodborne illness much more important and life threatening in lesser developed countries than in most developed countries It would be therefore ethnocentric and rather simplistic to state that the margin of improvement in food safety is only directly proportional to the level of development of the society or to the level of complexity of any given national or international standard Besides standards and regulations humans as a whole have evolved and adapted different strategies to provide and to ensure food and water safety according to their cultural and historical backgrounds Our goal is to discuss and to compare these strategies in a cross cultural and technical approach according to the realities of different socio economic ethnical and social heritages
