Abstract

Kangrang, A., Prasanchum, H., Hormwichian, R., Techarungruengsakul, R., Ngamsert, R., Phookinghin, N., & Wangthken, J. (2019). Improvement of water management project by correcting irrigation water requirement in farmer participation and optimization. Bulgarian Journal of Agricultural Science, 25(5), 852–863

This study explored water resource management in an irrigation project in Yasothon Province, Thailand in order to improve the water resource management system. The Huay Sabag and Huay Ling Jone Irrigation Schemes pilot projects were studied by field observations, interviewing stakeholders and collecting data. Data were collecting about water requirements, allocation and land use and then corrected using farmer participation. The improvement of water resource management was achieved by improving reservoir rule curves that provide decisions concerning release of water following the corrected water requirement. The results revealed that monthly water requirements corrected by farmer participation are less than existing water demand and that the newly obtained rule curves of both reservoirs provided more reserve stored water for irrigation water requirement than the previous rule curves.

Introduction

Water is essential for human and animal survival. However, flood and draught are still classical water problems. There are many challenges and problems that remain unresolved including poor quality irrigation distribution, lack of incentives for stakeholders and low efficiency in reservoir operation etc. It seems that the above issue of stakeholders in water management is the aspect of prime importance for sustainable development. A review and analysis of participatory irrigation management reflected many problematic aspects, such as the level of stakeholder participation, sources of finance and water requirement estimation. Nowadays, stakeholders' involvement in water resources management is seen as an ongoing process to promote efficiency of water resources management for sustainable development (Cuesta & Rañola, 2009; Molobela & Sinha, 2011). Stakeholders need to participate in water management to effectively integrate the goals of efficiency, sustainability and equity for all sections. Supporting stakeholders in managing their water resources to make choices and to reach a common understanding on sharing water is the basis on which stakeholders should seek a well-informed decision (Chenoweth, et al., 2002). To make the transition to more sustainable water management, most analysts recommend managing water based on river basins and increasing stakeholders' participation in water management (Wester et al., 2003). There are great challenges in a transition to participatory decision-making in water systems management, especially regarding public participation (Song et al., 2011). Effective public participation is the key factor to improve the

Social Capital and Local Water Management in Egypt

Dalia M. Gouda, 2016-11-02 From the 1980s onward billions of dollars were poured into irrigation improvement programs in Egypt. These aimed at improving local Nile water management through the introduction of more water efficient technology and by placing management of the improved systems in the hands of local water user associations. The central premise of most of these programs was that the functioning of such associations could rely on the revival of traditional forms of social capital: social networks, norms and trust for their success. Social Capital and Local Water Management in Egypt shows how the far reaching social changes wrought at the village level in Egypt through the twentieth century rendered such a premise implausible at best and invalid at worst. Dalia Gouda examines networks of social relationships and their impact on the exercise of social control and the formation of collective action at the local level and their change over time in four villages in the Delta and Fayoum governorates. Outlining three time frames: pre 1952, 1952-73 and 1973 to the present, and moving between multiple actors: farmers, government officials and donor agencies, Gouda shows how institutional and technological changes during each period and the social changes that coincided with them yielded mixed successes for the water user associations in respect of water management. Social Capital and Local Water Management in Egypt is essential reading for anyone working in the field of community based natural resource management in Egypt, including policymakers and practitioners, donor agencies and civil society organizations as well as anthropologists and sociologists.

Water Ethics David Groenfeldt, 2013-10-01 This book introduces the idea that ethics are an intrinsic dimension of any water policy program or practice and that understanding what ethics are being acted out in water policies is fundamental to an understanding of water resource management. Thus in controversies or conflicts over water resource allocation and use an examination of ethics can help clarify the positions of conflicting parties as preparation for constructive negotiations. The author shows the benefits of exposing tacit values and motivations and subjecting these to explicit public scrutiny where the values themselves can be debated. The aim of such a process is to create the proverbial level playing field where values favoring environmental sustainability are considered in relation to values favoring short term exploitation for quick economic stimulus, the current problem or quick protection from water disasters through infrastructure which science suggests is not sustainable. The book shows how new technologies such as drip irrigation or governance structures such as river basin organizations are neither good nor bad in their own right but can serve a range of interests which are guided by ethics. A new ethic of coexistence and synergies with nature is possible but ultimately depends not on science, law or finances but on the values we choose to adopt. The book includes a wide range of case studies from countries including Australia, India, Philippines, South Africa and USA. These cover various contexts including water for agriculture, urban, domestic and industrial use, the rights of indigenous people and river watershed and ecosystem management.
