

Migration, Identity and Sovereignty

Introduction

Economic Systems and Labour Flows

Globalization has significantly increased both internal and international migration.

As of 2014, approximately 230 million people, or 3-4% of the global population, lived in a country other than their birthplace. This rise in migration can be attributed to advancements in transportation networks, making it easier for people to travel internationally for work, residence, or leisure.

Additionally, an increase in global trade has encouraged international migration, reaching levels not seen since the collapse of empires. Most of this migration is regionalized; for example, many Mexicans migrate to the United States, while many Poles migrate to Germany.

Uneven economic growth can often be traced back to natural advantages, such as access to coastlines or raw materials, which have historically given certain countries a head start. These initial imbalances have been intensified over time due to the outflow of migrants, resources, and investments.

The rate of international migration has surged, mirroring global population growth, which increased from 2.5 billion in 1950 to 7.3 billion in 2015. During the 1990s, most international migration flowed toward global cities like New York and Paris. Today, however, cities in developing countries, such as Mumbai and Lagos, have also become significant migration hubs.

Causes of Migration

Migration, whether internal or international, can occur for a variety of reasons. The motives for migration often influence both government policies and public perception toward migrants.

Key causes of international migration include:

- Voluntary Economic Migrants: Individuals move to improve their economic situation and quality of life. Frequently, economic migrants' families follow them in pursuit of similar benefits.
- Refugees: People are forced to relocate due to war, conflict, or persecution.
- Asylum Seekers: Individuals seeking international protection due to threats in their home countries.
- Environmental Refugees: People compelled to move because of environmental factors like tectonic disasters, natural events (e.g., wildfires, flooding), or climate change impacts (e.g., desertification, sea-level rise).
- International Students: In recent years, there has been significant growth in the number of young people migrating to study abroad.

The nature and volume of international migration flows are likely to evolve as various environmental, political, and economic factors shift and as countries experience changes in development.

Different countries have structures, shaped by the globalized world. Here's a closer look at

Singapore

- Singapore has a high percentage of foreign workers, contributing to its population of 5.6 million, which is highly ethnically diverse.
- As the world's fourth-largest financial center, Singapore hosts numerous transnational corporations (TNCs) with Pacific headquarters in the state.
- Many international schools have also been established to accommodate the educational needs of migrants whose first language may not be Malay, the national language.

- Japan's population is in decline. The working-age population of what it was in 2007, only 5% of people are typically stands at only 1.7%.
- The United Nations estimates that by 2050, there will be 12 million immigrants in Japan.
- Several factors limit migration outside the country, and policies regarding immigration.
