This article describes the author's discovery of mindfulness and its method and describes the bias against mindfulness even at the beginning of the 21st century. The short essay also throws light on recent developments in mindfulness training and practice in the world and in the state of Kerala in South India.

'Sir, the Professor is on the way...' a resident ran hurriedly into the room to inform.

The meditation session in progress ceased. The projector opened its eyes onto the screen in front, tinted yellow by oldness. Slides on bipolar disorder began to roll on. The professor witnessed the class in progress with satisfaction.

The year was 2001. The venue, Mental Health Centre of the State. The attendees were about fifty nursing students who had come for their psychiatry training from various nursing colleges in the state. The class was being taken by a young psychiatrist (me!), who wanted to walk through the pathways of mental healthcare less travelled by many. Curious about and fascinated by the meditations of Jon Kabat Zinn, Emeritus Professor of Medicine at the University of Massachusetts Medical School, and the work of his classic masterpiece Full Catastrophe Living,<sup>2</sup> I journeyed into the world engulged by a little book – The Miracle of Mindfulness – penned by Thích Nhất Hạnh, a Vietnamese monk.<sup>3</sup> By the time I started to lay my initial steps, mindfulness, the Eastern contemplative practice rooted in Buddhism, had been reasonably well integrated into the fields of medicine and behavioural health, grounded in Western science.<sup>4</sup> Still, I was reading about and attempting to practise a method that was equated with having schizophrenia among professionals in my part of the country.

Jon Kabat Zinn defined mindfulness as the awareness cultivated by non-judgemental, open,
