

caught in the treadmill of office jobs and 'respectable' domestic life. They showed contempt for the mainstream by painting flowers and peace signs on their faces, and wearing a heady combination of home-made hand-dyed dresses and tops, ethnic beads and tunics and denim and velvet flares. Long, unkempt hairstyles for both men and women blurred gender divides further; their fluid 'natural' style was a proven-failed imitation of the American dream and the ethics it stood for, in particular the American government's policies concerning the Vietnam War. To some, the freely middle-class teenagers who made up the bulk of hippies were simply expressing an adolescent desire to irritate and confuse the older generation. Ron Kline wrote of hippies' protest dress in 1973 as at a game of gaudiness, and while many hippies were genuine in their protests, there was also an element of antagonism towards their parents' bourgeois ideas of dress and cleanliness to their style. Kline pointed out the hippie's wish to always stay ahead of respectable dress codes: 'Whereas the businessman wanted a white shirt, the hippie wanted a colouration. As soon as the businessman wore a colourful shirt, the hippie looked for a garish one; he always wanted to be different.'²⁴

While in the second half of the twentieth century youth culture has been constantly pursued by the mainstream, which appropriates and normalises its iconoclastic styles, for some hippies there was more at stake than the need to be countercultural. Over the next three decades, environmentalists became increasingly committed to 'saving nature', and promoting a more thoughtful approach to all aspects of life, from home-planting and road schemes to eating habits and the design and efficiency of household products. While 'hippie' became a term of abuse in a culture obsessed with consumption and the progress of technology, hippie culture evolved in Britain, to include the army-surplus-clad Crones of the 1980s and the New Age Travellers, who were some of the most ardent ecological campaigners. Their dress once again recurrently rejected obvious expenditure, favouring second-hand and home-made garments mixed with cheap leggings and sturdy boots. At first they were turned into folk devils by the media, they embodied fears of a breakdown in law and order, fed by a misunderstanding of alternative lifestyles, which were perceived as attacking the status quo. The peripatetic lifestyle of the New Age Travellers made them unpopular with landowners, keen to get them off their property, and when collectors like the Spital Fields became involved in staging illegal raves, their media image was further tarnished. Such groups were firstly rejected by the mainstream, which was alarmed by its obvious a refusal to 'accept' lifestyles. While the later anti-road campaigns and the planned construction of the Newbury bypass in 1996 may have made them out of some New Age-misconceptions, hailed in the tabloids for their stance against government transport policy, suspicion remained about those who opted out of conventional lifestyles.

However, even among the more conservative there was a genuine desire to seek out more environmentally friendly products, and thereby not only help to save the planet, but gain a tangential sense of union with a mythical ideal of nature.

This vision was formed as much by marketing strategies that played on feelings of guilt and a sense of lack in an era of rapid technological advance, as on long-held, perhaps deeper, visions of the natural world, as the opposite of constructed culture. This perception of the natural is itself culturally constructed, relying upon both contemporary anxieties about the environment in post-industrial society, and a desire to retreat into false nostalgia for a distant countryside idyll. As Kate Cooper has pointed out:

It is only a culture which has begun to register the negative consequences of its industrial achievements that will be inclined to return to the wilderness, or to aestheticise its return as a form of foreboding against further advances upon its territory.²⁵

For fashion designers, this desire for products which are ecologically sound has meant a search for fabrics that are derived from sources that have as low an impact on the environment as possible, and which are either left untouched and undyed, or coloured with natural dyes. Mass market brands like H&M strive to produce an eco-friendly range of clothes, exchanging bright colours for the softer hues of natural dyes. Designers like Dorel Mong, looked into using hemp, possibly the greenest fabric available, but it would take the commitment of major chain stores to enable hemp to be produced and manufactured in a cost-effective and ethically sound manner. The problem with such fabrics and processes was that consumers still hankered for vibrant shades like the turquoise and shocking pink fashionable in the summers of 1967 and 1968, but lacking in eco-credentials.

Katherine Hamnett has been particularly committed to using green-cottons and other fabrics that combine both ethical production methods, and the dream of ethical consumption, with all the nostalgic ideals this embodies. In her spring/summer 1994 collection, she showed ecologie flower dresses, with low-cut bodices covered with shiny straps, their soft beige hue the sign of natural cotton. Mesclum also used green-cotton the same year in his Ensemble collection, that developed his critique of fashion and consumption. He had already painted T-shirts with the slogans, 'Fashion is full of shit', and 'Stare Symbol', as well as the environmental message
