Deformed thread.—The deformed-thread locknut (fig. 3) is a common locknut, particularly in the aerospace industry. Its advantages are as follows:

- (1) The nut can be formed in one operation.
- (2) The temperature range is limited only by the parent metal, its plating, or both.
- (3) The nut can be reused approximately 10 times before it has to be discarded for loss of locking capability.

Nylok pellet.—The Nylok[®] pellet (of nylon) is usually installed in the nut threads as shown in figure 4. A pellet or patch projects from the threads. When mating threads engage, compression creates a counterforce that results in locking contact. The main drawback of this pellet is that its maximum operating temperature is approximately 250 °F. The nylon pellet will also be damaged quickly by reassembly.
